Preface

The original impulse for writing this book was that I had a great many concepts and ideas. In late 2025, having just encountered AI for the first time, I thought AI could easily help me transform my ideas into a book. But from the very first word I discovered that AI can only do the work of providing examples and data. It sometimes offers useful directions — for instance, the title Primal Race was thought up by AI — but sometimes it says exactly the opposite of what I mean, which is dangerous.

At first I wrote a version, let AI revise it, then rewrote a version following AI's suggestions. Because of this — and because of the need to first lay the conceptual brickwork — the first two chapters look very academic and mechanical. From Chapter Three onward I only wrote my own version; and with definitions clearly established, I could expand the theory freely, getting more and more freewheeling. Expression is the purpose — and it is also the central topic of this book — and I myself must first write to my heart's content.

So please appreciate what "a tiger's head on a snake's tail" looks like — hahahaha.

Note: Chinese is my first language, so I wrote in Chinese and then translated.

Abstract

This book is grounded in Johan Galtung's Violence Triangle framework and proposes an axiomatic definition of Injustice is Violence: $\text{Violence} = \text{Potential} - \text{Actual}$. On this foundation the book constructs The Primal Race Theory, arguing that race is defined through Phenotype, Background, and Culture, and that biological sex is fundamentally a race issue — the traditional race based on skin colour emerged after the race of women, and follows the same logic by which that race was formed. Women, as the "Primal Race" colonised throughout human history, have undergone biological modification and suffered systematic plunder premised on biological reality. Violence against women is the most deeply entrenched racist hatred since the rise of patriarchy. The constitution of the female race provides the blueprint for all subsequent racial constitutions and violence.

Key Findings and Critiques

The Sexed Nature of Violence. This book elaborates on Galtung's classification of violence (direct violence, structural violence, and cultural violence) and examines it through a strict Sexed Lens. Data show that biological females are the overwhelmingly primary victims of all forms of violence. From FGM and female infanticide (physical layer), to the legal deprivation of abortion rights (structural layer), to menstrual taboos (cultural layer) — the target of violence has always been women's biological functions: reproduction and sex.

The New Violence: The Suicidal Dissolution of Female Identity. Beyond the traditional triangle this book defines a new form of violence — violence regarding identity politics. Gender (■■■■) is a social construct (Social Construct / Cosplay), while Sex (■■■■) is a biological fact. Queer theory's Gender Performativity states that gender is a performance existing only at the social level. We can acknowledge the fluidity of gender as performance, but we cannot ignore the facts of biological sex. When transgender ideology is deployed to consolidate women's status as a performance, it dissolves the concept of "woman" and strips biological females of their only stronghold in political struggle. Every era is one in which identity politics runs rampant; dissolving female identity leaves women with nowhere to stand. This dissolution is either a malicious plundering of women, or a kind of Naive Evil or suicidal means. Queer theory also attempts to prove that the Universal Woman does not exist — data refutes this. Not only does the universal woman exist, but biological females should be bound to the concept of the Natural Woman; the universal woman should have a natural state. The Natural Woman is humanity — all genders.

Meta-Violence. The root of the above phenomena lies in Male-centered Narratives — a Meta-Violence guiding all violence, not merely gender violence. Within the Primal Race Theory framework it established the primordial model of Maker-Subject → Made-Object → Plundered-Object before skin colour and class emerged. In terms of sex, it not only shapes male superiority at the virtual level (male-bonding culture, the porn industry) but also permeates every dimension of reality, dominates the direction of identity politics, and makes identity politics a tool by which patriarchy fully colonises women's living space. From there it extends to all forms of violence against others / the weak / the different: exploitation, humiliation, war.

The Co-conspirators Theory. Any form of family / friendship / social unit can be defined as a "micro-patriarchal regime" — a concrete crystallisation of society's Male-centered Narratives. Religion and Romance are the social-level anesthetics that maintain the stability of these units. This book reveals a critical trap: many so-called progressives merely despise the singularity and restrictiveness of these anesthetics, rather than opposing the essence of the Male-centered Narratives behind them. Unsatisfied by the old anesthetics, they often embrace more seductive sugar-coated bullets (radical identity politics), simply swapping one drug for another — transplanting the enchantment structure of religion and romance onto fabricated progressive concepts, remaining in essence Violence Initiators and their co-conspirators.

Proposals

Ultimate Vision — Biological Separatism. By removing violence initiators (all males and malicious female co-conspirators), and using reproductive technologies (IVG / parthenogenesis) to fundamentally reconstruct the social unit.

Realistic Path — Just Units. In the reality where the vision is not yet achieved, establish social units based on the principle of zero violence. So long as any combination of Sex / Gender units does not impose violence internally or externally — i.e., does not output the meta-violence of Male-centered Narratives — these diverse unions are non-patriarchal Just Units.

1. Expression: The Establishment of Identity and the Biological Wall

Expression is not merely a tool of communication — it is the confirmation of existence. Expression determines who you are.

Expression is how you present yourself to the world: your appearance, your voice, your dress, the language you use, your manner, the places you choose to be seen, and the people you associate with. "Birds of a feather flock together" — the essence of this clustering is that human beings, based on Resemblance and Familiarity, form a diverse and overlapping array of races and tribes. "Race" here encompasses the traditional skin-colour-based race. Racial division arises from differences in expression.

Race is defined through Phenotype, Background, and Culture. Phenotype, background, and culture all carry particular expressions. Beyond skin colour, gender identity, ethnic identity, regional identity, class identity — all of these are, in essence, products of comparing the similarity of expression across these three dimensions, either evoking empathy or igniting rivalry, dividing people into different camps above and below the surface.

Phenotype

Phenotype is the most immediate expression. It is the world's visual judgement of you before you open your mouth or display your taste. It includes not only innate biological characteristics but also the bodily form sculpted over time by lifestyle. Biological characteristics include your skin colour, bone structure, hair colour, secondary sex characteristics, and so on; lifestyle includes whether you are muscular or whether you shave your legs. In human instinct, phenotypic recognition does not depend on verbal communication — it is a direct visual impact.

Black and white people are quickly visually sorted into camps by phenotype; obesity or postural problems are typically marked as lower-class phenotypes, while a good physique and appropriate dress make it easier to be accepted into a particular class camp; women and men distinguish themselves through secondary sex characteristics — in itself carrying no hierarchy, secondary characteristics were originally without social meaning. Yet under the conditioning of patriarchal society — whether the Asian ideal of "pale, thin, and youthful" or the Western trend of "hypersexualised" physique — through the stripping of women's physical and social power, the phenotypic difference between biological males and females becomes, in most ordinary circumstances today, quite significant. This difference lies chiefly in physical capacity — the ability to apply direct violence. The expression of lifestyle is fluid; the expression of biological characteristics is very difficult to change.

Background

Background encompasses your geographical origin, family class, and the historical environment in which you grew up. It determines your accent, your dietary habits, and the subconscious sources of your sense of security. Background often determines whether you were born with a silver spoon or struggle in a slum, whether you typically experience violence or are the one who executes it. The traces left by one's native background (regional identity, childhood trauma) often constitute part of a person's "baseline character"; yet with modern social mobility, people can modify their background through emigration or class ascent.

A person may belong, at different points in life, to one or more hometown associations, alumni networks, or simultaneously (and selectively) to an alliance formed around the shared experience of biological women, and/or the so-called "shared female experience" of social women — the performative women. People sometimes express themselves through native background and "baseline character," sometimes through acquired migration and identification.

Culture

Culture is the most autonomous, freely acquired expression: the language you use, the religion you profess, the aesthetic taste you display, your style of dress, and your political stance. People broadcast their camp affiliation and seek the resonance of like-minded others by wearing particular cultural symbols (a certain hairstyle, slang, clothing), through specific language, taste, and ritual. Examples: Black culture — hip-hop, jazz, AAVE, dreadlocks; the "high" and "low" culture consumed and touted by old money and nouveau riche; hometown dialect or shared food preferences; the conventional maintenance and enactment of socially assigned roles — fraternity-style bonding, "men suffer too," "men don't cry," "a father's love is like a mountain," "a mother becomes strong for her child," slut-shaming, and so on — each confirmed by stereotype, nod, handshake. Cultural expression is explosively free and diverse.

Although not one hundred percent controllable due to institutional and cultural factors, cultural expression — because of its autonomy — exerts the greatest actual influence on racial classification. This brings us to the political nature of identity.

The political nature of identity in a nutshell: expression is the extension of human existence; people form races through every form of expression; race gives you identity; and through identity your existence acquires social and political meaning.

The political nature of identity is a passive attribute one is born with, and identity politics is a skill — the use of identity's political nature for alliance and struggle.

Why politics at all? According to Wikipedia, "politics refers to the domain of activities relating to decision-making in social groups, which may also arise from other forms of power relations, such as the distribution of status and resources." How are decisions made? Who makes them? How are status and resources distributed? Who decides how? In practical life, politics is people using camp alignment to pursue their own interests — and camp alignment relies on identity. As Carl Schmitt said, politics begins with the friend-enemy distinction. All politics is essentially identity politics.

Identity politics is something every person faces simply by existing. You represent yourself and simultaneously represent your camp, as well as all those who regard you as "one of us" or "one of them." People rapidly perform friend-or-foe identification through your phenotype, background, and cultural expression — trying to confirm your "kind," trying to define your identity. Therefore, even if you represent only yourself, there is no such thing as a "depoliticised" expression, and there is no escaping interaction with other camps. As long as you are alive, every action is a vote, aimed at achieving the optimal solution in the game of "existential war." I will elaborate in the next chapter.

In sum, human existence and expression are essentially political; identity politics is the inevitable alliance and struggle based on biological characteristics (Phenotype — biological characteristics) and social foundations (Phenotype — lifestyle, Background, Culture). It is worth noting that Phenotype — biological characteristics — is the only one among these identity traits that cannot be changed, or can only be imperfectly changed at great cost.

The Biological Wall

The social foundation is fluid. As Judith Butler notes, Gender can be a repetitive "performance"; as Pierre Bourdieu points out, class taste can be acquired or feigned through the accumulation of money and cultural capital; geographic location and national identity can also be changed through emigration. But you cannot "perform" your chromosomes; you cannot, through postnatal effort, "acquire" biological characteristics that are not originally yours.

You cannot make a biological male pregnant or produce eggs, or make a biological female produce sperm. You can change muscle mass through hormones, but you cannot reshape bones and organ capacity — to accommodate childbirth, the female pelvis is wider and shallower. This results in a larger angle between the femur and the knee, called the Q-angle; a larger Q-angle means women's biomechanical efficiency is lower when running. The adult male heart is on average 15–20% larger than the female heart, and lung capacity is 10–12% greater. On average, males have longer limbs relative to the torso — which means women's physiological performance ceiling will always be lower than men's under equivalent conditions.

Conversely, before menopause, women's cardiovascular disease incidence is significantly lower than men's, because oestrogen protects the vascular endothelium, lowers bad cholesterol, and maintains vascular elasticity. Women have a more powerful immune system: the X chromosome carries more than 1,000 immunoregulatory genes (versus a few dozen on the Y). If one copy is defective, the other immediately compensates (X-inactivation mosaics). In almost all infectious disease pandemics — from influenza and SARS to COVID-19 — women's survival rates are significantly higher than men's. In short: the biological wall limits the upper bound of women's physical power while also constituting women's survival baseline. The biological wall limits men's ability to gestate — for biological females, both an advantage and a curse.

Hormone therapy and surgery can alter secondary sex characteristics and even reshape the external appearance of genitalia. But this only changes "how things look" and "how social interaction proceeds." Technology currently cannot change the logic of germ-cell production (gamete type), cannot alter neuroendocrine history or the genetically determined metabolic baseline, cannot erase the muscle-fibre memory and skeletal mechanical advantage left behind by having gone through a male puberty, and cannot rewrite the sexually dimorphic brain architecture established in the embryonic stage. The biological wall persists in the domain of transgender experience.

This wall means that for women, from the embryonic stage, they must allocate enormous energy to the development and maintenance of the reproductive system (regardless of whether they ever give birth). Butler's performance theory applies only to gender — you can perform "femininity," you can wear "women's clothing," but you cannot perform "menstrual cramps," cannot perform "the hormonal storm of carrying a life," and cannot perform "menopausal bone loss." These physiological experiences are facts that do not yield to subjective will.

We note this biological wall in identity.

2. Existential War: Fierce Game and Optimal Expression

Existential War and the Game

As established in Chapter One, human existence and expression are essentially political; identity politics is the inevitable alliance and struggle based on your expression. Conversely, all human expression carries the intent of identity politics. The former is about being classified, knowingly or not; the latter is about actively striking out, knowingly or not. Why actively strike out? Because people and all opinion and political expression space constitute a fixed quantity that must be competed for. Although in the dimension of "meaning" human expression can be infinite, in the real dimensions of "power" and "attention," the space that can hold expression is finite.

Within this finite space, people are the media of political voting rights. The linearity of time and the scarcity of attention constitute de facto exclusivity within finite space — when you are forced in the span of a single sentence to choose one formulation, choosing that narrative necessarily suppresses the other. When one fact is written into the official record, the contradictory fact disappears or enters the underground. When one narrative becomes fact, the other becomes false. Choice has meaning only because there is something given up; voting has meaning only because there is a choice. This finite space must be competed for. Such competition is not a binary switch — it has a progress bar and the possibility of merging — but at every node it is zero-sum. For people, consciously or not, this is a game about the value of one's own vote in society — an Existential War.

Existential war is the game conducted in all expressive spaces with others, based on identity politics.

The Fierce Game: From Private Domain to Public Space

The battlegrounds of the game include, but are not limited to: Opinion space — under the dominance of a mainstream narrative, many marginal narratives are sacrificed, yet these marginal narratives may contain a more complete and reasonable truth. Power seats — in political policy, choosing to uphold the rights of one group amplifies that camp's existence, whether or not it damages other camps' rights. Human attention — the time people can "see" is finite; the moment attention is drawn to something, the possibility of "seeing" anything else is lost.

Beyond these public domains, private spaces (home, bedroom) have always been battlegrounds too. The family institution is essentially economic cooperation for child-rearing and social status maintenance; it is no less contested than social competition, except that once established, the private world is rarely exposed to the outside world, lacks external influence, and thus carries a kind of inertia, while external competition always involves great variables. But at their core, all these games are highly intense.

Carol Hanisch, who coined "The Personal is Political" in the second wave of feminism, exposed the power struggles — or "racial" struggles — taking place within women's private family space to the public sphere. "Husbands cheating, marital rape" — family matters were no longer gossip but politically charged topics. From that point forward, women's disempowerment in the private sphere could generally be exposed and vindicated in public space — a very hopeful direction, a phased victory.

"The Personal is Political" actually applies to everyone: every person, even those within the private sphere, continuously exerts influence on public space. This is especially true in an era when women had no public space to enter while men monopolised public space and private-domain decision-making power — when "person" equalled "man." What has changed in modern society is merely that women have gradually gained decision-making power — "person" now equals "person."

The 1969 woman gathering in private to talk about the pain caused by the men in her household was personal-is-political — "personal" suffering became a "political" problem. The 2026 man who, after entering a mutual privatisation agreement with a woman through marriage, gathers in private to talk about the "suffering" caused by the women in his household — then internally implements domestic violence and gaslighting and externally promotes policies harming women in public space — is also personal-is-political, "personal" evil becoming the "politics" of violence.

Among the most obvious yet insufficiently recognised crossovers of the private and public game is how women handle reproduction and childcare. Reproduction and childcare often cause women to vanish from public space precisely during their career-ascending years; when they try to return, they find the battlefield has changed and their former seats have been taken — the notorious Motherhood Penalty. The man who wins in the private arena (gains children without paying the bodily cost) earns a Paternity Dividend in the public arena (seen as more responsible).

According to the ILO, globally women's labour participation rate is about 47% versus men's 72%. Globally, 21.7% of women aged 15+ say they cannot seek paid work due to "family and care responsibilities," compared to only 1.5% of men. 606 million women of working age are outside the labour market because of full-time family care, versus only 41 million men. The remainder of the participation gap comes from laws (104 economies still legally prohibit women from certain types of work), access to education (two-thirds of the world's illiterate population are women), and statistics (many women engaged in subsistence agriculture are counted as "unemployed").

At home they face: nearly 60% of femicides globally occur in the private domain; 82% of intimate-partner homicide victims are women.

Did men win? According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS), globally 90–95% of fatal workplace injury victims are male. According to UNODC's Global Study on Homicide, 79–81% of homicide victims globally are male. In almost all OECD countries, male suicide rates are 3 to 4 times female rates. The proportion of men with zero close friends has quintupled over the past 30 years (U.S. data). In Russia and certain other countries, male life expectancy is over 10 years lower than female.

When the opponent is the institution and the violence machine, no one wins: according to the ILO and Walk Free Foundation's latest data (Global Slavery Index), approximately 50 million people currently live in modern slavery — forced labour: ~27.6 million (55%); forced marriage: ~22 million (45%).

Society is made up of people; institutions and violence machines are also run by people. Existential war is an exceedingly intense game — usually bloodless, yet genuinely lethal. A game against people, against institutions, but ultimately against people. And what has been cited here represents only the most ordinary forms of "existence," without "exceptional" "high-end demands" — yet each "player" must mobilise their life in search of an optimal solution.

"Just Expression" and "Optimal Expression"

Just Expression is the system's optimal solution. Imagine society as an organism, each person a micro-cell. By valuing individual rights and the fairness of cooperation, by striking a balance between individual and collective development — sacrificing or emphasising certain individual interests so that the system's overall benefit increases and thereby compensates or eliminates the previously sacrificed individual interests, so that the whole and every individual within it benefit — this is the "system optimal solution": simultaneously maximising personal rights while keeping the system functioning and maximising everyone's rights. Its essence is a collectively upward collectivist mentality. This requires every "cell" to be equipped with a universal-values / idealist mindset. Concrete examples: all humans are born equal regardless of rank; standing up for others; following order; helping others; calling out those who cheat the system; celebrating truth, goodness, and beauty.

In reality, however, amid the high-intensity game described above, the just expression of the structurally disadvantaged is systematically suppressed or transformed into the Optimal Expression that enables survival under a homogenising, oppressive cultural and institutional hegemony. The most just expression available to ordinary people oppressed under the Taliban regime is not reporting women who secretly work or study; who has the strength to overthrow the regime? Fleeing or surviving becomes the optimal expression. Where law enforcement is weak and gangs and police are close — or the police are the gang — the optimal expression may even be to bribe the police, to maintain good relations with gangs and police.

A man who is frequently bullied may be someone with great empathy and a protector of the weak, but if the social environment glorifies the law of the jungle, anti-intellectualism, and cruelty, and does not reward protecting the weak, and he is powerless to resist, he may even come to "play the woman," adopting this mental posture to "fall in love" with men (similar to Stockholm syndrome) or women (similar to "a man hurt you so you became a lesbian") — not saying all who perform femininity are in this frame of mind, but "woman" in many people's eyes equals "weak," and so, being constantly bullied, he concludes he has become "a woman," and performing "woman" becomes his optimal expression.

De Beauvoir said woman is a Situation — this is inaccurate. The woman she is talking about is the gender woman, a kind of role-play, and any script can be fitted to this role. She can be strong or weak; to say woman is a situation is to say that whoever plays the woman is necessarily weak. In fact, biological women have their strengths and weaknesses; social women also have their strengths and weaknesses depending on how they play the game. But on the toxic social consensus of "woman = weak," it becomes a container for some people's optimal expressions.

The Alienation of the Optimal Solution

The True Optimal Expression is 100% most beneficial to you while simultaneously expressing justice towards others. The Optimal Expression is the socialised version — most beneficial to you while expressing "social contract" towards others, within the bounds of social convention. Every person's optimal expression goes through the same process of suppression and transformation under high-intensity competition, in four steps: (1) You become someone else's optimal expression; (2) society changes; (3) others' optimal expression becomes your optimal expression; (4) your optimal expression disappears. This is the win or loss of existential war: your former true or false optimal expression becomes a subset of someone else's, and your subjectivity disappears.

The Optimal Solution of the Structurally Disadvantaged

In a highly competitive society, the structurally disadvantaged seeking their true optimal expression find it very hard to be a "normal, relatively flawless person" without being willing to be "devoured." Many women do not enter marriage; do not reproduce, staying in the workforce; emigrate to countries with better fertility policies; find a "house-husband" to carry out childcare. In East Asian societies especially, this kind of woman is increasingly common, yet even so they are often not defined as "normal, relatively flawless." Left-over woman, career devil, loser, easy girl, tank feminist, selfish, gender antagonist — which in turn feeds back into their motivation.

Data from their behaviour: South Korea's total fertility rate fell to 0.72 in 2023 (Seoul even below 0.6), globally the lowest. China's marriage registrations fell below 7 million pairs in 2024. Japan's lifelong unmarried rate among women reached 17.8% in 2020. In Korean and Japanese women who emigrate, women outnumber men nearly 2:1 in many Western countries. Over 70–75% of young Korean women say "if I had the chance, I'd like to live outside Korea" — typically 10–15 percentage points higher than same-age men.

Finding the True Optimal Expression: The Biological Nature of Subjective Will

Sartre held that human existence has subjective will, which is in essence a "capacity for negation" — you negate the present state to achieve the desired state. The source of this "desire" is crucial. If your "desire" is merely what Lacan called "the desire of the Other" — planted by the violence of patriarchal language and culture (e.g., "I also want to become an oppressor" or "I want to obtain power through beauty service") — that only shows you have already lost your True Optimal Expression.

Modern science answers Sartre's confusion about why identical twins react completely differently to the same event. First, modern whole-genome sequencing confirms that absolute biological identity does not exist — even identical twins develop somatic mutations and copy-number variants during development; they are two machines with subtly different hardware from the start. More critically, will itself has been shown to be thoroughly materialist. Neuroscientist Benjamin Libet and his successors demonstrated that as much as 300 milliseconds — even 7 seconds — before our "subjective sense" of deciding, the brain's motor cortex has already generated the Readiness Potential. It is bioelectrical current that makes the decision, not a "soul."

That is to say, each person is constituted by a unique genetic baseline into an authentic expression. On top of this, epigenetics further reveals how environment physically rewrites will. Environmental pressure (patriarchal oppression, poverty, war), while not altering DNA sequence, can physically rewrite gene-expression switches through DNA methylation. "An orange grown south of the Huai River is an orange; grown north, it is a trifoliate orange."

How to find the True Optimal Expression: Subtract — audit all your "wants." When a strong wish arises ("I want to be 45 kg," "I want to marry before 30"), stop and ask: what fuels this desire? Is it fear? If the Other disappeared, with no audience or evaluation system, would you still want to do it? If the answer is no, this is not your optimal solution but a shackle. Capture bodily signals — Libet's research shows the brain decides before consciousness intervenes; catch the fleeting "I want" before the social conditioning "I should" kicks in; your cortisol level is more honest than your logic. Physical migration — since postnatal environment modifies gene expression via epigenetics, the core strategy is not to transform yourself but to transform your environment. Just expression — when you plunder others to achieve your goals (fraud, oppression, emotional vampirism), you input a force into the system. Your cause will have its effect; "justice" must be internalised, not an external moral constraint, to better "benefit oneself."

Existential war is, at root, a battle for your True Optimal Expression. If your True Optimal Expression (e.g., independence and strength as a woman) forces others or the system to change (e.g., women's athletics receives more attention) — or causes the other party to lose the unjust "optimal solution" they wanted to impose on you — that is winning in existential war. Conversely, if your original True Optimal Expression is erased by the environment (e.g., accepting that "playing the weak is my optimal solution"), that is losing — the death of subjectivity.

3. Weaponisation of Expression: The Art of Manufacturing Possibilities

From the previous chapter we know that — from wars between nations down to each individual's existential war — expression has always been output as a weapon, and therefore each person's reception of expression is a defensive battle, which means the importance of choosing one's input sources.

The Cognitive Gateway: Writing History, Controlling Opinion

Large corporations, governments, media, and even private individuals can weaponise expression and deploy it at scale to individuals, thereby controlling people's thought and behaviour. Possessing traditional print media, television, radio, long- and short-form video, advertising — the state can use these to promote war. At this moment, war — beyond its material gains — becomes a spectacle, a political performance, a form of aggressive, violence-invoking expression for individuals and groups alike, in democracies and dictatorships both.

For example: China's excessive enthusiasm for "reclaiming" Taiwan at times of domestic economic difficulty has not won the approval of Taiwanese people or even many Chinese citizens; periodic war mobilisation becomes a tranquilliser for nationalist citizens. The state can also promote anti-war messaging while funding extreme male-supremacist regimes — using globalisation, love, and peace as surface work to maintain appearances. The state can also use human rights as a pretext for aggression; human rights is not the goal — oil and silencing rival states in the international discourse is. Example: the U.S. government's claim that Iraq possessed WMDs — polls at the time showed over 70% of Americans believed it, yet after the war began, no WMDs were found; but the war was over and the oil contracts were signed. "Middle Eastern women need to be liberated, so we must attack Afghanistan" — a narrative that received progressive moral backing; after 20 years of war, when U.S. forces withdrew in 2021, Afghan women's status was worse than before.

Power and media can also through various channels densely write and depict different perspectives to distort facts — or rather, to express the facts they endorse — thereby subtly altering the audience's thoughts and cognition, like the film Inception: once the "correct" ideas and facts are planted, a mental brand is formed, and people are already controlled by someone else's reality — their existence has been colonised without their knowing.

The Identity Gateway: Filtering, Exclusion, Partisan Grouping

People who call themselves left-wing do not necessarily act left, and those who call themselves right-wing can have egalitarian vision. People "mingle" in their groups because the diversity of parties, groups, and viewpoints is truly lacking; many expressions must be extreme to attract conformity rather than nuanced. Most people, going with the crowd, become either left or right — choosing one stance while receiving a package deal of many others, or intentionally radicalising "the enemy's" stance to attack. Extreme positions: recognising stricter requirements for immigrants must mean accepting white supremacy; supporting Palestine equals supporting Hamas; supporting transgender rights must mean believing they are identical to biological women and supporting their entry into women's sports / women's prisons / women's changing rooms. Pure black-or-white thinking is truly asking too much.

The filtering of aesthetic taste to consolidate class is another gateway. Expression itself is a privilege; commercial teams create consumption symbols amid great fanfare, and ordinary people's expression is drowned and they become a fixed-seat audience. Whoever stands atop the hierarchy of disdain, whoever has the power to define labels and set their price — that is the weapon the powerful in the commercial world can deploy against others. Power = discourse power = the ability to label and price others.

The Emotional Gateway: Romantic Narratives, Religious Idols

Expression as weapon also has the common gateway of emotion. The most persistently effective is the trap of romantic narrative. Not that romantic love does not exist — but the excessive glamorisation of romantic love causes many people to be immersed in a kind of psychosis induced by this substitute "drug," leading to frenzied behaviour. What is love? Love is a collection of feelings, actions, and beliefs. Romantic love is only a very small part, but in film and music, pursuing romantic love to the death is an extremely common and celebrated ideal. Pursuing "The One" and then marrying, forsaking all others, treating marriage — which has evolved into an economic unit (buying a home, children's schooling, a series of consumption over a lifetime), and is originally a product of patriarchal private property — as a sacred and romantic act, enshrining it — this ideology is deeply internalised through individual, group, and even institutional output.

The most famous scam born of romantic love is the diamond. "A Diamond is Forever" (De Beers, 1947) — diamonds are in fact one of the most common stones in the world, yet through decades of intense marketing, commerce bound them to romantic love and marriage; by monopolising supply to create scarcity, an artificial consumer convention was created from nothing, which in turn reinforced the mass impression that romantic love is eternal and worthy of unlimited pursuit. The so-called soulmate is dynamic: if someone "loves a person for a lifetime," it is because their lives are deeply intertwined and each finds growth or an anchor in the other — and because romantic love has transformed into other forms of love — not because of romantic love's own power.

The harmfulness of this narrative lies first in that women are especially easy to fall into this trap and neglect their own rights. Some films focus on how the "dominant CEO" controls women, how a stalker quietly eliminates bad people around the woman to prove his "love," wrapping violence in colourful candy and serving it to women who accept it entirely. The "sacrifice for love" glorified by narrative is in reality often unilateral, irreversible, and gender-asymmetric — overwhelmingly women give up, men benefit. An NBER study based on German and Swedish data found that after a partner relocates, male income rises while female income stays flat or falls; the researchers explicitly noted these decisions are driven by traditional gender norms, not household income maximisation.

On the topic of self-regulation, religion and idol worship are the most common expression weapons that exploit human vulnerability, establishing "sacredness" to exercise spiritual dominance. Religions have good aspects — for instance, fellowship functions as community gathering, uniting people at the grassroots level to develop together socially. But this kind of social form does not require a worshipped spiritual entity to be achieved — let alone worshipping anti-scientific, anti-intellectual theories on a par with conspiracy theories, such as the Resurrection. The truly firm control is the kind that needs no whip — it is a woman who herself believes that wearing a veil is her pious path to heaven, internalising the "sacred" narrative into a mechanism of self-censorship. That is the terrifying efficacy of self-regulation — one has lost one's existential war to the point of being entirely absorbed into another's will, while still worshipping one's own shackles.

The idol industry shares with religion the feature of worship — and worship depends on limitless idealisation, which in turn depends on packaging and distance, which means commercial deception and concealment. The idol industry especially glorifies men, since female idols are often turned into sexy symbols, sexually objectified; whereas male idols, especially in East Asia, remain on their pedestal however serious their crimes. This glorification of men in daily life subtly reinforces patriarchy — two sides of the same patriarchal structure: women produced as the sexual resource of "the object of the male gaze," men produced as the god and authority of "the subject looked up to." This narrative causes women to further internalise the heterosexual romantic narrative.

The Bodily Gateway: The Pornography Industry

Speaking of the sexualisation of women, the output of pornographic product can be called a biological attack of hard narcotics. Pornography is first of all not real; second, it is insulting to women. Internalising that insult is like having others address you with slurs and humiliating language and not only accepting it wholesale but treating those words as compliments — oh, I've been praised.

Porn addiction is highly similar at the neural mechanism level to drug addiction: the dopamine mesolimbic system shared by alcohol, opioids, cocaine, and pathological behaviours such as gambling, internet use, gaming, and pornography. Pornographic content, like cocaine, triggers similar neural responses in the brain — and it is called the hard-drug equivalent because the intensity it delivers far exceeds any natural reward. Under repeated bombardment the brain develops tolerance as it would to drugs — the threshold for sexual arousal is continually pushed upward; real partners, real intimacy become insufficiently stimulating, so escalation occurs: not the user actively choosing increasingly extreme content, but the neural level compelling the constant search for newer, more intense content to elicit the same response. The WHO cautiously classifies porn-addiction-related symptoms as "Compulsive Sexual Behaviour Disorder" rather than "addiction," but it need not carry a label to operate as a drug — which is precisely what makes it terrifying.

Who is the "drug dealer" doing this unconscionable thing? The world's largest porn website and the world's Nth largest are operated by the same company — Aylo (formerly MindGeek) — meaning what appear to be many "different" porn sites are actually highly monopolised by a single company. Aylo is owned by Ethical Capital Partners, a Canadian-based private equity firm that acquired MindGeek in March 2023 and renamed it Aylo in August. The renaming was due to the New York Times exposé of MindGeek hosting child sexual abuse material. Aylo operates through a network of subsidiaries registered in Canada, Luxembourg, Cyprus, the British Virgin Islands, and Curaçao — a cross-border structure for tax avoidance and regulatory evasion. So we know that the pornography industry — which has shaped the nocturnal brains of perhaps billions — is in the hands of a few or even one person, in the hands of "money, power, and influence." Pornhub alone had approximately 4 billion monthly visits as of August 2025.

The Art of Possibility: Manufacturing Reality

We have explored the four gateways through which expression-as-weapon can invade. We can see clearly that the attacking side is composed of individuals to state regimes, and the defending side likewise. In these bloodless existential wars, people can manufacture reality through these expression weapons, and from manufactured reality create possibilities — this is the art of existential war: seizing the power of narration, the power of interpretation, the power to manufacture what counts as fact, thereby creating possibilities favourable to oneself.

What is reality? Different viewpoints and perspectives create different realities, as if parallel worlds. But we know there exist constant, publicly verifiable absolute facts: if a war occurred and six million people died, they died. If your chromosomes are XX, they are XX. These are realities not subject to perspective. What the art of possible reality that weaponised expression competes over is: whether these deaths are a genocidal massacre or the heroic elimination of totalitarianism; whether "you are just a woman" or "you are a sacred woman" or "you are a woman." Power does not compete over what the facts are — facts are what they are — but over how facts are depicted, and what function the depiction plays in the four gateways of the receivers.

4. The Co-conspirators Theory and Meta-Violence

Two theories thrown at you again — let me briefly introduce them first.

Co-conspirators Theory: Analysis of how many men and women gain survival advantages — through enacting the various forms of violence mentioned in the next chapter, primarily cultural violence — under the established patriarchal rules shaped by meta-violence (taking sides for the sake of "winning").

Meta-Violence: Namely, Male-centered Narratives. A generational, interpersonal monopoly on the power of interpretation. It explores why violence persists under "rational, civilised" rules: civilisation as cover — as long as it does not involve physical killing, all "civilised life" is essentially a battlefield of weaponised expression.

Meta-Violence

Meta-violence — from the name alone one can tell it refers to the original form of violence, or "all violence begins here." When I say meta-violence refers to Male-centered Narratives, I am declaring: all violence is gender violence. Does this conclusion hold? Chapter Five validates it through data.

Why is Male-centered Narratives a form of violence — why meta-violence? Think of the Bechdel Test: (1) the work must have at least two named female characters; (2) these two female characters must have had a conversation; (3) the content of their conversation is not about men. This bare minimum condition, according to bechdeltest.com, saw about 44% of films in 2025 fail to pass — nearly half. In other words, in 2026, when you open a 2025 film you have roughly a fifty percent chance of watching a film where all the women revolve around men. How modern is that? Is the modern jungle not still a jungle society?

The common template: a male lead who is a saviour or the leader of some group, possibly with a harem or not, and a female lead who can be "selected" or "conquered"; the female lead is a pure soul from an untouched world and/or possesses extraordinary abilities — yet this formidable character simply doesn't engage with the world, and yet she inevitably enters into a romantic relationship with the male lead. How many films made from similar templates have you seen? Is the capable female lead a female-centered narrative? If the final landing point is serving a romantic relationship with a man, then it is a male-centered narrative, and the female character is constructed only to set off the male lead's charm.

Male-centered narratives constitute a form of violence against our brains — and the various forms of violence in society ultimately follow the same structure as male-centered narratives. That is why male-centered narratives are a meta-violence. According to Galtung's Violence Triangle, "the various forms of violence in society" include: Direct Violence (a specific perpetrator, a visible incident — beating, rape, murder, war; "event-based," visible, bloody); Structural Violence (no specific perpetrator, but violence embedded in social structures, institutions, resource allocation — systemic inequality, certain groups institutionally deprived of health, education, safety, development; "process-based," slow, diffuse, often seen as "the status quo" rather than identified as violence); and at the base — most critical — Cultural Violence (the parts of culture used to legitimise, justify, and make the first two seem natural or right — religion, ideology, language, art, science, the narratives they compose).

Galtung's core proposition: the function of cultural violence is to make direct violence and structural violence "look not like violence, even look correct." When we listed the weapons of expression in Chapter Three, those were all bullets for enacting cultural violence — romantic narrative, religion, idol culture, pornography, the national apparatus and war narrative, opinion, identity — all are male-centered narrative cultural violence weapons. Male supremacists take this sort of thing and try to make a virtue of it — as if dying for some nebulous grand narrative, or even without a grand narrative, simply following orders, were some glorious thing. This is handing over one's life before even finding one's own existence in existential war — and that is the stereotypical "real man." In war, men are both executors and beneficiaries of this narrative, and also its victims.

Thus we can argue: Meta-Violence = Male-centered Narratives.

The Co-conspirators Theory

Everyone is a co-conspirator — as previously mentioned, one can co-conspire to do good things. But the reason I have not written the Co-conspirators Theory as neutral in this book is that the theme I am exploring is how women as an original group have struggled and survived under these violent expressions, and in reality most co-conspiracies — especially in cultural and structural institutions — are plotted to take advantage of women.

Here again is the marriage institution. Let us discuss how marriage among Western people lets the man in the marriage freeloader: the woman bears a whole batch of children, and that whole batch of children and this multi-child mother all carry the man's surname. In ancient society men needed to provide protection — in some scriptures rights and obligations are reciprocal. In modern society, how does a man provide protection? Many men themselves need protecting.

"White-thin-young" aesthetics have made women weaker generation after generation — being unable to beat men is beautiful. Violence is in others' hands; there is never safety. How then to speak of equality, relying on others' conscience? Civilised society has rules, relying on the state violence machine — ultimately relying on men to restrain men. And if there were no bad men, where would the heroic good men be? Creating a problem and then solving it — to demonstrate one's value. This is a co-conspiracy between men: some are responsible for committing crimes, some for catching criminals; everyone has something to do, everyone has value.

Is it not a conscious or unconscious social co-conspiracy? Think carefully about what "masculine" means, what "feminine" means, even what a man is, what a woman is. I believe that aside from the physiological distinctions caused by genitalia and secondary sex characteristics, men and women are in all respects undifferentiated — and if transgender technology could reach a certain level, enabling men to become pregnant and women to ejaculate, or other alternative technologies, then men and women would be completely indistinguishable. Cyberpunk 2077.

But is technological development always good? Without ethical norms established in advance, blindly developing technology can only lead to tragedies like Oppenheimer's. Many believe that after men can become pregnant, women will have no function, and thus conservative women have always maintained a co-conspiracy with conservative men — shaping the sacred mother and glorifying the power of the womb, to slow the pace of technological development. Here, even though the conclusion I reach goes in the same direction — technological development should be slowed before ethics are established — I have not entered into a co-conspiracy with them; they are co-conspirators with each other.

The most important thing is that, without cultural influence, men and women have no intellectual gap. The strength gap between women and men is a perennially misunderstood topic. Yet in matrilineal societies men and women had roughly comparable strength. Scientifically, a Cambridge study found that Neolithic women 7,000 years ago had arm strength surpassing that of modern elite female rowers — showing prehistoric women were extremely strong. Simultaneously, skeletal research shows that human sexual dimorphism has declined historically, and the primary reason is the "gracilisation" of males between the late Palaeolithic and Mesolithic, related to changes in hunting technology and prey.

AIDS — a disease brought by men having sex with men or with women — receives $3 billion per year in funding in the U.S. (NIH's single largest disease research investment). Dysmenorrhoea — the number is so small it is not even in the same order of magnitude, and it is very hard to find an independent "dysmenorrhoea research budget" because it is small enough to be lumped into larger projects. For reference: uterine fibroids — which can lead to hysterectomy — receive $17 million. On one hand extolling the importance of reproduction, on the other controlling the female uterus, and on yet another ignoring uterine disease — some male-female co-conspiracy bodies are positively schizophrenic.

Men or women can each be a united identity group, yet the female group finds it very hard. Beyond the intoxicating traps this world has queued up for them — romantic love, consumerism, and so on — recognising the difficult situation of women and remaining optimistic is rare and precious. Many people cannot stay optimistic, refuse to acknowledge women's situation, or become co-conspirators with men. For an individual's existence, this is an effective solution, is it not? Yet looking at the big picture, I don't think this is a truly good ending. Most importantly, co-conspiracy with men brings various forms of violence imposed on women, making them even less able to resist, even more in need of co-conspiring with men — a vicious cycle.

5. The Violence Triangle: Data

Chapter Four established that Meta-Violence = Male-centered Narratives, and proposed a stronger claim: all violence is, in essence, gender violence. Chapter Four merely declared it, leaving the burden of proof to this chapter. This chapter first clarifies what the proposition actually says, then validates it with data.

One misreading must first be excluded. "Gender violence" here does not mean "violence whose victim happens to be female." Defined that way, the proposition would immediately be overturned by a cluster of data: the vast majority of fatal workplace injury victims are male; most homicide victims are male; most soldiers sent to die on battlefields are male — calculated by "victim's gender," it looks more like "all violence targets men." But the gender violence this book refers to is violence driven, legitimised, and structured by Male-centered Narratives (i.e., Meta-Violence). The criterion for identifying a piece of violence as gender violence is not the victim's gender but its driving narrative. Under this definition, violence whose primary victims are men is equally gender violence — because treating male bodies as disposable tools, equating "real man" with the ability to inflict and absorb violence, enshrining domination and conquest as supreme values — these are equally products of Male-centered Narratives. Men within this narrative are both executors and beneficiaries, and also its victims. The male corpse on the battlefield and the woman killed at home spring from the same machine.

I. Cultural Violence Layer

War

- Empires of Violence points out that the true engine of colonial massacre was not racial hatred — race "never played more than a marginal role" — dehumanising discourse was merely a tool to justify killing. Narrative first, massacre follows.
- War treats "using people (especially male bodies) to exchange for grand meaning" as glory. There are currently over 170 active conflicts; global military spending exceeded $2.2 trillion in 2023, while budgets for aiding victims are being cut. [UN News 2024]

News

- The UN juxtaposed Valentine's Day's warm romantic narrative against the reality of approximately 12 million girls forced into child marriage each year — the media's dense coverage of the former causes the latter to vanish from public view. [UNICEF / UNFPA]
- GMMP 2025 shows women account for only 26% of news subjects and sources, rising just 9 percentage points in 30 years; women are more often cast as eyewitnesses rather than cited as experts. [GMMP 2025 / UN Women]

Romance

- Globally 1 in 5 women is married before age 18, versus 1 in 30 men; every 3 seconds a girl somewhere in the world is married. [UNICEF; UNFPA]
- "A Diamond is Forever" (De Beers, 1947) artificially bound one of the world's most common stones to eternal love, manufactured scarcity through supply monopoly, and created the global consumer convention of the engagement ring from nothing. [De Beers / N.W. Ayer]

Aesthetic Class

- Total cosmetic surgery procedures globally reached 34.9 million in 2023, 85.5% performed on women, up 40% over four years. [ISAPS 2023]
- By 2024, rhinoplasty remains the most common cosmetic procedure for patients aged 17 and under — cultural pressure of aesthetic norms has reached down to the bodies of underage girls. [ISAPS 2024]

Pornography

- Commercial pornography binds an insulting script for women to physiological pleasure. Research shows porn addiction shares the mesolimbic dopamine reward circuit with cocaine, opioids, and gambling. WHO classifies related symptoms as Compulsive Sexual Behaviour Disorder in ICD-11. [WHO ICD-11]
- AI deepfakes escalate the pornographic weapon: a 2023 study found 98% of deepfake videos online were pornographic, 99% of victims were women, surging 550% since 2019. [Home Security Heroes, 2023 State of Deepfakes; UN Women]

- The Bechdel Test — its bare minimum requiring two named female characters who talk to each other about something other than men — is still failed by nearly half of films each year. [bechdeltest.com]
- GMMP 2025: news coverage involving gender violence accounts for less than 2% globally, despite affecting half the world's population; coverage challenging gender stereotypes has fallen to a 30-year low. [GMMP 2025]

Religion

- UNICEF notes that customary or religious law tolerating child marriage is one of the core factors placing girls at risk, and the practice persists stubbornly even where civil law nominally prohibits it. [UNICEF Data]

- Afghanistan is today the only country in the world that bans women from secondary education and above; approximately 2.2 million girls are barred from secondary school. The Taliban's 2024 law even prohibits women from speaking in public or on the radio. [UNESCO 2025; UN News 2025]

Idol Culture

- K-pop researchers note that young female idols' bodies are especially objectified — commodified through revealing clothing, suggestive choreography, and agency control of weight and appearance; when girl groups are promoted by governments as national cultural resources, the sexualisation of girls' bodies is normalised and even encouraged. [Lee, Leaver & Abidin (2026), SAGE]
- The idol industry deliberately cultivates a parasocial illusion. This is the breeding ground for out-of-control sasaeng fan behaviour. [allkpop 2024]

Marriage

- At the current rate of progress, completely ending child marriage would take approximately 300 years. [UNICEF USA]
- Approximately 640 million living women were married in childhood; romantic narrative packages this systemically sanctified institution as a destination, while for girls it is the deprivation of choice. [UNFPA]

II. Structural Violence Layer

War

- Empires of Violence: in colonial massacres the state was "always complicit" — directly organising militias, paying scalp bounties, or turning a blind eye; and the book notes massacres were "fundamentally a male enterprise."
- Over 612 million women and girls currently live under the shadow of conflict — decisions that expose populations to the structure of war are made almost exclusively by male-dominated state machines. [UN News 2024]

News / Opinion

- Reuters Institute 2025 survey of 240 major news brands in 12 markets: of 171 editors-in-chief, only 27% are women, despite women averaging 40% of journalists; male editors-in-chief are the majority in all 12 markets. [Reuters Institute 2025]
- At the current pace of change, gender parity among news editors-in-chief will not be achieved until 2074; in Asia and the Middle East, women account for only ~19% of news subjects. [Reuters Institute 2024; GMMP 2025]

Romance / Marriage

- World Bank Women, Business and the Law 2024: factoring in legal differences on violence and childcare, the global average woman enjoys only about 64% of men's legal rights; no country grants women equal opportunity. [World Bank WBL 2024]
- The Motherhood Penalty: in the U.S. in 2024, full-time mothers earn 35% less than full-time fathers; uncorrected, this accumulates to approximately $600,000 less over 30 years. In households where women are primary earners, mothers' incomes drop ~60% relative to partners after childbirth. [Bankrate 2025; PNAS study]

Aesthetic Class

- World Bank estimates that eliminating the employment gender gap could raise global GDP by more than 20%; only one-fifth of economies have gender-sensitive standards in public procurement, excluding women from $10 trillion in annual economic opportunity. [World Bank WBL 2024]
- South Korea has the world's highest per-capita plastic surgery rate (~8.9 per 1,000 people); approximately one-third of women aged 19-29 have had procedures; double-eyelid surgery accounts for 21.6% of all procedures — directly linked to a ruthlessly appearance-based job market. [Gitnux 2026; ISAPS; Berkeley study]

Pornography

- Aylo (formerly MindGeek) monopolises Pornhub, Brazzers, YouPorn, RedTube, and dozens of other adult brands; parent company legally registered in Luxembourg while executive layer operates from Montreal, cross-border structure evades regulation and accountability. [Aylo Wikipedia; Canadian Privacy Commissioner PIPEDA 2024-001]
- Tools for producing deepfake pornography are now widely available, usually free, requiring almost no technical skill; once published, can be copied infinitely, spread cross-platform, and almost impossible to fully delete — the victim structure is open to any woman. [UN Women 2026]

Religion

- In West and Central Africa where child marriage is most prevalent, girls marrying today occur at nearly the same rate as 25 years ago; sub-Saharan Africa's 2024 child marriage rate is 31%, versus 38% a decade ago. [UNICEF USA]
- Since 2021, over 80% of women previously working in Afghan media have lost their jobs; if the education ban persists to 2066, excluding women from higher education alone could cost Afghanistan up to $9.6 billion — roughly two-thirds of its current GDP. [UNESCO 2024/2025]

Idol Culture

- K-pop trainees as young as 12 or 13 sign with agencies that control their diet, dating, and behaviour; most contracts require repayment of training, clothing, and living expenses — meaning income after debut may be zero. Known as slave contracts. [Wikipedia (Slave contract); ULA Carolina]
- The industry packages idols as an always-available parasocial-partner image — a commercial design that directly breeds the sasaeng's possession/access mentality: tailing flights, breaking into dormitories and hotels, installing tracking devices. Critics identify this as a structurally manufactured consequence. [allkpop 2024; SCMP]

Marriage

- Even though 50% of economies (98 of 190) legally mandate equal pay, fewer than 20% (35) have pay-transparency or enforcement mechanisms to implement it. [World Bank WBL 2024]
- The exit and pay reduction from marriage and childcare are worse in remote work: U.S. remote-working mothers earn only ~79 cents for every dollar earned by male peers; pay-transparency laws have not yet significantly narrowed this gap. [Allwork / 2024 Pay Report]

III. Direct Violence Layer

War

- Contemporary warfare uses sexual violence systematically as a weapon: the UN verified 3,688 cases of conflict-related sexual violence in 2023; 95% of victims were women and girls, 98% of child victims were girls — a 50% surge over the prior year. [UN Secretary-General Report on Conflict-Related Sexual Violence 2023]
- Historical depth: in the 1994 Rwandan genocide an estimated 250,000-500,000 women were raped; up to 90% of surviving Tutsi women experienced sexual violence; rape was deliberately used as a tool for spreading HIV as a weapon of extermination. Sierra Leone war: 60,000+; Bosnia: 20,000-50,000; Congo since 1996: at least 200,000 women raped. The proportion of women killed in armed conflict in 2023 doubled compared to 2022, accounting for 40% of war deaths. [HRW; UN Women; UN News 2024]

Romance / Marriage

- In 2023, 85,000 women and girls were intentionally killed worldwide; 60% (~51,100) died at the hands of intimate partners or family members — on average, one woman or girl dies at the hands of a partner or close relative every 10 minutes. [UNODC & UN Women, Femicides in 2023 (2024)]
- Globally approximately 25.8% of women aged 15-49 have experienced at least one instance of physical and/or sexual violence by a current or former male partner — the narrative that "marriage is safe" is bankrupt in the face of data. [UNODC & UN Women 2024]

Aesthetic Class

- Over 230 million living women have undergone female genital mutilation (FGM) — 15% more than in 2016; in half of the countries with data, most girls are cut before age five. [UNICEF, FGM: A Global Concern (2024)]
- More alarming: a growing trend of girls being cut at increasingly younger ages, many before their fifth birthday — aesthetic and chastity norms fulfilled from the cultural layer all the way down to a blade against the body of a toddler. [UNICEF 2024]

Pornography

- Following the 2020 New York Times expose of Pornhub hosting videos of minors and non-consensual material, the platform deleted approximately 80% of its content at once; the company still faces litigation including class actions on behalf of underage victims. [CSE Institute; TIME 2026]
- Deepfake pornography can be applied to any woman: in early 2024, AI-generated pornographic images of Taylor Swift garnered over 47 million views on X within hours; the Stanford Internet Observatory found child sexual abuse material (CSAM) in AI training datasets. [U.S. House Hearings 2024; Stanford Internet Observatory]

Religion / Idol Culture

- South Korea lacks dedicated legislation preventing the sexualisation of minors in media, in stark contrast to the U.S., UK, France, and China; a talent show recruiting girls under 15 to compete for debut was criticised for exposing minors to exploitation and sexualisation under the guise of entertainment. [Korea Times 2025]
- Sasaeng fans push parasocial delusion towards direct harm — tailing idol flights, breaking into dormitory and hotel rooms, delivering marriage proposals, placing wreaths symbolising death at idols' homes to force their retirement. This "possessive worship" is the violent endpoint of the same mechanism shared by religious deification and commercial idol-making. [SCMP; allkpop 2024; The Bird Feed 2025]

News / Opinion

- Estimated direct civilian deaths from the Iraq War range from 150,000 to 210,000, with indirect deaths totalling hundreds of thousands — a lie about "weapons of mass destruction" legitimised and settled as real bodies. [Every Casualty Counts; Lancet 2006]
- GMMP 2025: even in coverage of gender violence, nearly one-third of reported women have their profession or identity deliberately omitted, rendering their identity and authority ambiguous — opinion still enacts a second erasure of women's subjectivity while

Conclusion

With these fifty-odd data points laid out, the proposition at the opening of this chapter — "all violence is gender violence" — can now be closed. We converge the chapter with four stacked judgements.

I. The Violence Triangle: not three kinds of violence but three faces of one Galtung divided violence into direct, structural, and cultural layers — intending a classification. But after laying out twenty-seven groups and nine weapons of data, what is revealed is not three independently existing types of violence but the same violence operating at three depths simultaneously. Any single weapon makes the point: the romantic narrative glorifies marriage as a destination in the cultural layer, locks women into an institution in which they enjoy only ~64% of men's legal rights in the structural layer, and settles as one woman or girl dying at a family member's hand every ten minutes in the direct layer. Aesthetics establishes pale-thin-young as the standard in the cultural layer, pushes South Korean women to squeeze into appearance-based job markets through surgery in the structural layer, and realises itself as the cut genitalia of 230 million women in the direct layer. The three layers are not parallel but nested: the cultural layer makes people feel "this is simply how things are — even correct"; the structural layer solidifies this into institution; the direct layer is the final blow of this narrative landing on flesh.

II. Nine weapons — one assembly line

Chapter Three decomposed expression into nine weapons: war, news, romance, aesthetics, pornography, opinion, religion, idols, marriage. After laying out the data one finds that though they appear to belong to different domains — political, entertainment, religious, commercial — they operate the same assembly line: manufacture a narrative about how women should exist → weave that narrative into institution → impose physical or economic punishment at points of non-compliance. War seizes women's bodies; the idol industry manufactures a possessable illusion; religion uses scripture to lock girls' marriageable age; news decides whose voice is worth hearing — on the surface unrelated, yet every weapon's cultural layer ultimately points to the same sentence: women's bodies, voices, choices, and fates should revolve around and serve a male-centered order. Nine weapons are not nine problems; they are nine faces of one problem. This is why managing any one of them without touching the shared source is playing whack-a-mole.

III. Co-conspirators under meta-violence: why the rational, civilised world is still full of violence

That shared source is the meta-violence of Chapter Four — Male-centered Narratives. It is the ammunition of all expression weapons, and the master switch of the cultural layer's "this looks correct." And the reason it can keep operating in a world that calls itself enlightened, rational, civilised is not a few perpetrators, but countless co-conspirators. The historical evidence from Empires of Violence completes its task here: in colonial massacres, racial hatred "never played more than a marginal role" — the true engine was a narrative of making an Other, dehumanising, plundering; and the state was "always complicit," the massacre "fundamentally a male enterprise." Replace "coloniser / indigenous people" with "male-centered order / women" and this machine runs without the slightest modification — only more ancient and more hidden, because its object is not strangers on a distant frontier but the other half of every household.

Co-conspirators need not personally commit violence. The editorial room that defaults to men as the voice of authority; the agency that packages teenage girls as national cultural resources; the family that treats the Motherhood Penalty as natural; the law that writes equal pay on paper but has no enforcement mechanism — at every link, someone adds a brick because "this is advantageous to me" or "this is simply how things are." The frightening aspect of meta-violence is precisely this: it does not require everyone to be a villain — only enough people to be co-conspirators. Civilisation has never eliminated violence; it has merely moved violence from the direct layer into the structural and cultural layers, making it no longer look like violence.

IV. All violence is gender violence

So we return to the strongest proposition. It holds — not because all violence victims are female. That misreading was excluded at the outset of this chapter. Violence with males as primary victims on battlefields, in industrial accidents, in homicides is equally real. It holds because all violence can be traced to the same source — Male-centered Narratives, the meta-violence. Treating male bodies as disposable tools to send into battle; equating "real man" with the ability to inflict and absorb violence; enshrining domination and conquest as supreme values — these are equally products of Male-centered Narratives. Men within this narrative are both executors and beneficiaries, and also its victims. The male corpse on the battlefield and the woman killed at home spring from the same machine.

This is the full weight of this book's calling women the "Primal Race": violence against women is not one form of violence among many, but humanity's first systematic rehearsal of "making a Subject — making an Object — plundering the Object" — the blueprint and master template for all subsequent violence based on skin colour, class, and ethnicity. Only by understanding how meta-violence operates across the triangle's three layers, through nine weapons, by countless co-conspirators, do we truly understand that sentence: not that all violence happens to harm women, but that all violence speaks the same language. Dismantling that language is what the following chapters address.

6. Constitution of the Primal Race

Chapter Five laid out the data and provided preliminary argumentation; we will now discuss the centrepiece — the constitution of the Primal Race.

Human Rights are Women's Rights

From the data we can see what "all violence is gender violence" means. This answers the question of what a man is and what a woman is: society's current constructed expectation is that men are dominant and women are subordinate — this is the architecture beyond biological sex, i.e., Gender. Some people also expect biological males to be dominant and biological females to be subordinate; these expectations overlap. But as argued in Chapter Four, the physical side is not real, and the social side is a constructed expectation — which is human-made, not objective. That is to say, according to the expected "men dominant, women subordinate," all violence is dominant against subordinate violence — i.e., all violence is male against female violence — i.e., all violence is gender violence.

A fine example comes from Empires of Violence, on how colonists enacted violence: "What these empires had in common was the domination of one group over another in the name of racial and cultural superiority... murder, massacre, and violence were the means of forging new nations, political ideologies, and empires." "Women were raped, many killed, kidnapped, and enslaved. The conquered people often faced the contempt of the strong for the weak. Murder and massacre were among the many tools of the colonists, used to suppress populations that would not submit." "Why did European settlers feel the need not only to kill the men but also the women and children? These killings cannot simply be attributed to racial hatred, nor to retaliation for casualties among their own troops, militias, settlers, or loss of livestock."

From this we can see clearly that the state machine is a violence machine, and the violence it targets is gender violence. The most important thing in the existential war of history was to define in narrative and fact who is "masculine" — thereby enabling the subsequent perpetual soft gender violence, i.e., cultural violence, providing long-lasting legitimacy for structural violence and direct violence against "the feminine." Someone will therefore infer that what we should do is make "the biologically female" become "the masculine" — but this still constructs gender violence. What we should do is make "the feminine" become a neutral term equal to "the masculine," not "equal" but different and mutually constraining — for constructing Gender is making "the masculine" and "the feminine" into different terms, and as long as there are different terms there exists the construction of stereotypes, and as long as there is the construction of stereotypes there is no freedom or true equality. To have freedom, one needs to dissolve the socially constructed male-female gender.

Since ideally everything would be neutral, how can there still be a "masculine" and "feminine" distinction? — our surgery and technology have not yet arrived; there are still secondary sex characteristic differences between males and females. What I want to say is: dissolving as much as possible the distinction between men and women is the only way to truly focus on human rights. Human rights and women's rights need not be spoken separately — women's rights need not be emphasised as if women did not belong to human rights. Hillary said human rights are women's rights, women's rights are human rights. The most widely circulated is actually the second half, and its meaning is "please include women in the concept of people; please treat women as people." But she was right about the first half too: all violence is gender violence — "masculine" against "feminine"; protecting human rights is dissolving "masculine" violence against "the feminine"; protecting women's rights is also dissolving "masculine" violence against "the feminine"; therefore protecting human rights is protecting women's rights. Human rights are women's rights.

The Primal Race

Since the "human" in human rights equals "woman," does that mean women are the Primal Race? Of course it is not that easy to prove. From Chapter One we began with expression —

I'm tired. I bought this book and I'm not translating it for you — it's locked! Not writing any more!

[The author's original Chinese manuscript ends here — mid-sentence, with this handwritten protest. The abrupt ending is part of the authentic text. Chapter 7 (Proposals) appears in the table of contents but was never written.]
